

WHERE THE COQUI LIVE

The Big Island of Hawaii started as barren lava, emerging from the vast sea some 700,000 years ago. No plants, no birds, no life — just cooling rocks, surrounded by water. But life will have its way. Over the 700 millenia, multitudinous species came to the island — too numerous to count, barely even comprehensible with our imagination, let alone our eyes. It is lush life defined.

Then, in came the small and innocent coqui frog. Along with the palms and the mongoose — now considered an “invasive species” — the coqui have decided they enjoy the tropical island. They’ve decided to rule it. Marching day by day up the slopes of the volcano, their nightly calls are cute — at first. But must they court every night, all night, hour after hour? Yes, they must. Life will have its way. Come to think of it, isn’t every single life form on that volcanic island an invasive species?

I searched for hours to see a coqui. They are crafty fellows, hiding and hiding. All I found was where they hide, in deep in the protection of their botanical home, silent all day, but oh, so vocal at night.*
